Beautiful Restaurant, Sensational Food

Joe Watts - (Director) There are many reasons I wanted to "bring this play back", the most important is that in spite of, or because of what's depicted...it's a beautiful love story.

Brett D. Cullum - (Bert) JERKER is a new world for me. I came out in the late eighties, and remember being scared to even kiss another man. I was a gay man becoming aware of sex in a world where the sexual revolutions that had started with Stonewall had stalled. Love was a scary thought because it might mean illness or death, and I ran from it. Drugs, new therapies, a compassionate political climate and education gave everybody a lot of hope in the 90's. But now it feels like 1985 all over! Budget cuts endanger lives, drug resistance is a concern, and casual sex is on the rise. But this time it's not a voice on the telephone, but the sound of clicking keys on the Internet. JERKER was billed as a "pornographic elegy" for 1985 and the men of San Francisco. Unfortunately it still holds true today for many men and women young and old everywhere. But also relevant is the play's message that love can be found in the most unexpected places. I've loved many positive men in every way you can possibly imagine - as friends, mentors, and lovers. I would like to dedicate this performance to them for teaching me that love can not be killed. No matter how scared you are. And that love is something to be proud of, no matter who you are Glen Fillmore - (J.R.) Thank you Joe - For giving me this opportunity to both experience theatre and better understand those that have come before me that have endured the trials, fear.....and celebrations of being gay. I believe that their hardships and convictions have created a much more accepting society for gay men and women to celebrate life and love. May we all always remember the strength and power of love.....I dedicate this performance to my Uncle Buster and his partner Jack, celebrating over 40 years of Love..
